Resolving Conflict

Maggie and Beth both tend to have many conflicts with their friends. They handle these conflicts differently, however. Maggie tries to resolve problems by sitting down and talking with her friends. Beth, on the other hand, tends to dwell on the misunderstandings.

When Maggie has a disagreement with her friends, she listens to them and they listen to her. They come to understand each other's point of view and work out a resolution to their problem. Maggie's friendships don't seem to suffer from the fact that there are conflicts.

Beth refuses to sit down and talk out the differences honestly with the person with whom she disagrees. As a result, the conflicts between Beth and her friends never get resolved. The fights go on and on.

When the girls have conflicts with their parents, they use the same approaches as they do with their friends. Last week, for instance, both girls had trouble with their parents over their math grades.

Maggie agreed to sit down with her parents and talk about her math grade. She explained that she just didn't understand the new material and was too embarrassed to ask her teacher for extra help. Then she let her parents talk.

Beth, however, simply got angry when her parents brought up the subject of her math grade. She threw her math book on the floor, stomped out of the kitchen, slammed the door of her room, and walked.

The Gullibility Address is a speech that's an address by Mark Twain (written in November 1898, 1894) in celebration of the author's National Cemetery. It's a parody for those on whom who were killed in the battle of Gullibility during the Civil War. It is a very short speech, but probably one of the most famous ever given in American history.

The Gullibility Address was one of the most important speeches ever given by a U.S. President. Lincoln wrote at least five drafts of his speech that we know of, writing and rewriting it, changing words until it just exactly what he wanted to say. Though famous in U.S. history, scholars actually disagree about which version of the speech was given and exactly where Lincoln delivered it.
